Events in the world today clearly demonstrate the vital role of intelligence. In order to make decisions, the policy makers of the United States must receive intelligence information. The nation has entrusted the Central Intelligence Agency with this responsibility. Our mission is to collect, digest, collate, and interpret vast amounts of information received from all over the world.

To meet its obligation to the nation, CIA draws upon the outstanding talents of our country; CIA often needs people whose specialities appear to be unrelated to intelligence. Almost all intellectual disciplines are utilized, some of which are listed under the fold-over. New members of the organization are given special training, and receive careful attention through career development programs.
